COUNTY CLASSIFICATION BY SIZE OF LARGEST CITY, UNITED STATES, April 1940

Compiled by Nettie P. Dredger, Social Scientist

Many of the social and economic characteristics of a county are influenced by the size of the largest city within that county. Education, recreational, and health facilities, business activity and employment opportunities, birth and death rates, and the age-sex composition of the population are among the many characteristics of a county which are directly affected by the largest center of population within it. For example, counties having as the largest center a city of 2,500 to 5,000 population are likely to have a younger population, proportionately more males, fewer industrial employment opportunities, an economy geared to agriculture, and more closely-knit community groups than are found in the counties having cities of larger population size. On the other hand, counties having as the largest center a city of 50,000 population or more are usually characterized by an older population, a larger proportion of females, a variety of commercial and industrial work opportunities, comparatively lower birth rates, and a smaller mean size of family, than are counties having only cities of less population.

Because these general relationships between city size and socioeconomic characteristics do exist, a county classification by size of largest city can be used by agencies or persons interested in these characteristics on a county basis. Such a classification might well serve as a guide in interpreting the county variations observed in studies concerned with levels of living, population movements, wage rates, and other related subjects. The classification can also be used for stratification of the counties of the United States in sampling problems.

The classification of counties by size of largest city in this release is compiled from data derived from the 1940 Census of Population. Incorporated places are generally used throughout as a basis for classification of a county by its largest "city." There are three types of exceptions where the population living in communities other than incorporated areas is also considered in determining the largest "city" in a county: (1) In metropolitan counties, not having a central city of 50,000 or more, the entire population of the county is used as the basis for classification; (2) in counties with unincorporated villages having known boundaries and Census enumerations of their populations, the size of the village is used as the largest "city" if there is no larger "city" in the county; (3) if a "town" or other unincorporated community has been designated as "urban" by special rule of the Census, its size is considered in classifying the counties.

If a city or village is located in more than one county, the population of the entire city is considered in classifying each of the counties. Independent cities are considered as a part of the county in classifying the counties in which they are located.
